

A.M. Gwynn

Dandelions

The grass was noon high when last I passed here. I had rested with my crisp apple in this field, dandelions tucking butter under my chin.

This is where violence sprung without warning from the hips of our executioners. The crooked lines of shaking bodies re-loading like their rifles.

We witnessed our ends in the eyes of others, one by one the blue gas of their energies escaped then disappeared. Afterward, darkened outlines against the frost.
I wonder who comes to mow this field grass?

There has always been something in this field destined to be cut down.
I prefer tall grass, dotted with dandelions. Beautiful things considered weeds.

The children were shot first on purpose. Killing us for no reason was not good enough. My sister's grave is near the tallest pine. There is no inch of this field not given to a grave.
She lay as they had left her.
Not yet twelve. Silenced in their muddy boots and gun powder. They had spread her like water over thirsty dirt.

Perhaps, in one hundred years people may forget this place.
But I swear, there were wildflowers blooming from her dark hair matted in the earth like roots.

A.M. Gwynn writes poetry and short fiction. Her poetry will be featured in a forthcoming issue of War, Literature and the Arts: An International Journal of the Humanities. Her work also appears in Boston Literary Magazine. She resides in Germany.