

Virginia Bach Folger – Two Poems

One Night

One night in a rented room in a suburb in New Jersey we were lovers, playing at wildness and freedom.
We pretended it was Paris.
The streetlight peeking through the shade was the gleaming Eiffel Tower and the River Seine lapped at our naked feet.

Fade To Black

I once had a lover, a man I pursued because he had a habit of wearing bright red socks.
Those socks were mostly invisible, hidden between dark pant legs and well polished oxfords.
Without warning a crimson flash would peep out on a long stride or a crossed ankle, intriguing, endearing, defiantly bold.
He is old now, and the red socks
are gone.
“Too hard to match the reds”
he says. “Too much time.”

Virginia Bach Folger lives in Schenectady, New York. Ginny has worked as a gas station attendant, paralegal, switchboard operator, claims adjuster and corporate learning and development manager. When not writing poetry, she dotes on her seven year-old grandson. She has previously published in Horticulture magazine and Misjudge Your Limits and has poems forthcoming in Constellations: A Journal of Poetry and Fiction, and Still Crazy.