Chad Parenteau

You dreamed that you got out of bed to retrieve the charger

I dreamed I stayed up long enough for you to do so and call me back, after which you told me your plan to escape your job and meet me tomorrow morning after I ditch my boss, who I dreamt was Yosemite Sam, able to blast his way through anything except a cartoon drawbridge, which you dreamed was in the back of your jeep, which I dreamt jumping into the back of, peering out as my boss tried to micromanage his way through the cracks while getting flattened into the wall while we dreamed onto the sofa that you dreamed was turned over to you before dreaming your way to this new place, like both our places but with far less cluttered piles to mark our sighings, and we dreamt of falling asleep on the sofa where we dream again of waking up in our separate real homes before turning over to fall asleep and dream ourselves back again, thankful to wake up to another dream.

Chad Parenteau is the current host of the long-running Stone Soup Poetry reading series in Cambridge. His latest book is Patron Emeritus from FootHills Publishing.