Capers Like Eyes

Silver tray carried shoulder high laden with sandwiches and Saran-wrapped. But a small gap lurks.

In the revolving door of the office tower a wedge of salmon and cream cheese slips out to strike the marble floor.

The triangles of bread come unstuck bits of fishy pink fly out, and capers like eyes witness the revolving mess.

James Gering who lives in Australia, has been a diarist, poet and short story writer for many years. His poetry and fiction have won awards and have appeared in a number of journals including Rattle (#56), Every Writer, Meanjin and Cordite. A sample of his work can be experienced at jamesgering.com  When not writing, James ponders, cooks dinner for his family, and teaches English at the University of Sydney.